Saw Napoleon's Face Turn Pallid.

There died at Cambridge, Mass., last week a man who saw the great Napoleon. And yet he was but seventy-three years A delightful old man he was, too, this W. Kennedy, formerly of the White Star steamer Germanic.

The most remarkable thing which Captain saving of sixty lives-was his view of Napoleon. He was born on the island of St Helena, his father being an officer in the English detachment which guarded the imprisoned Emperor of the French, and it was when, in 1840, the body of the illustrious captive was given over to his countrymen for burial in Paris, that Captain Kennedy. then a boy, saw the features of the great Emperor. Upon the day of the transfer of tacks for the avowed purpose of making the remains the lad watched the ceremony sheltered from the rain beneath the folds of his father's military cloak. As the metallic casket was opened so that the French might see that they were receiving all that remained of the conqueror. Kennedy senior pushed his boy forward with the injunction to look at the form which was to be disclosed. Thus he saw the calm features. $150. Henry W. Piel was appointed guard- like those of a man who had just fallen asleep; the gloss of the broadcloth uniform; the brightness of the buttons, the perfection of everything, all so startling. But the instant the air came in contact with the face an ashen pallor overspread it. and almost before the lid could be replaced the look of life disappeared and the great man returned to dust. It is not improbable that Captain Kennedy was the sole survivor of that historic moment.

The Wifeless Man.

From Lewis's "Richard Croker." I'm convinced of the certain failure of the wifeless man. Go where you will with those who have success, and whether you search among warriors, or statesmen, or his hands, your champion will fail not to have a wife. Which is the cart and which the horse elude me as proposals; whether one is weak because he lacks a wife, or lacks because he's weak, I cannot tell. Sure it is, however, that in all arenas of effort the wifeless man is weak.

Decline in the Tea Trade.

It is certainly a tendency that has been noticed in this country and recently has been so strongly developed that the gravest anxiety in circles that used once to make much money in the tea trade has been created. Recently an attempt was made to discover through questions put to men of life-long experience in the tea trade what it was that had caused a depression in that trade that could only be compared tariff of 10 cents a pound, but the great majority who replied to the inquiries declared it to be their belief that the people coffee was more and more taking its place.

The recent figures that have come from Washington to some extent tend to prove ures show that the people of the United States consumed nearly 800,000,000 pounds of coffee, valued at nearly $3,000,000, in the year ending June 30, 1900, whereas they consumed only 84,000,000 pounds of tea, valued at about $10,000,000, and this was a
